

Josh Kinder, 4rd Grade, St. Francis/Holy Ghost

To me honesty means being truthful. Being honest means always telling the truth about everything. Honesty also means being true to yourself. Being true to yourself means always doing your best. Also, being honest means being trustworthy.

You could show honesty at school by telling the truth about turning in assignments. If the teacher asks if you did your assignment, and you did not, you should be honest about it. You can also show honesty at school by not cheating. Showing honesty at school by not cheating means doing your own work and not copying someone's work.

You could show honesty at home by being truthful about homework. If you had homework to do you should finish it all. If a parent asks if you have finished all your homework you should be honest. A person that is honest at home should be truthful about grades they receive at school. If the grades are bad or good, always be honest to your parents.

A person that I think is the most honest is my dad. He always works very hard until the job is done. He always does his best at his work. He always tells the truth, whether it's good or bad. My dad does not gossip or tell lies that could hurt others.

I decided to write about honesty being my favorite trait because, I think it is the most important trait to have. One of the "Ten Commandments" is "You shall not lie." There was even a president that had the nickname "Honest Abe." No matter what you do in life, honesty will always be important. Honesty is an important trait for everyone to have so that people will believe in you.